THE management at Kuan Aik Hong Construction (KAH) believes that accidents can be prevented if everyone shares the same vision and is committed towards ensuring better workplace safety and health (WSH).

Its WSH goals target zero workplace fatalities for all projects, to prevent injuries and ill-health due to work, and to provide a safe and healthy work environment for all employees.

Managing director Thomas Lee says that winning a Workplace Safety & Health Performance Award (Silver) this year is a recognition of the company's commitment to its WSH goals — workplace safety and performance of its health management systems.

Mr Lee attributes the company's success to the dedication and commitment of its entire workforce.

He says: "Our responsibility is to make sure everyone goes home safely to their families daily."

To achieve this, KAH encourages all employees to have a self-committed and positive attitude towards workplace safety and health.

This will motivate others to work towards preventing workplace injuries and ill-health too.

Recipe for success

Mr Lee stresses the importance of implementing WSH measures at all construction sites, as this in turn contributes to the company's success.

He points out that having a good workplace safety record boosts employees' confidence and leads to higher productivity.

But accidents in the workplace will result in lost time and delayed work progress, discouraging workers, hindering productivity and affecting the company's reputation.

In addition to the mandatory safety practices and requirements set out by the WSH guidelines, KAH constantly emphasises the importance of workplace safety and health using methods such as regular safety promotion campaigns.

"These serve to educate new employees who have just joined the company as well as remind existing workers to place safety as a priority," he adds.

To ensure that employees remain committed to excellence in WSH, disciplinary action is taken for safety non-compliances, while recognition is given to employees who have performed well in this area through performance appraisals.

Mr Lee says: "We do not forget to reward those who go the extra mile to ensure safety is never neglected."

"This means that the safety morale of the worksite is always high."
